History of Greer

Greer is a quintessential sleepy, southern town established in 1873 with refurbished mill housing and older stately homes. A beautiful city park with musical interactive fountains is along the route as well. A Veterans Park with an old tank and helicopter on display. Plenty of places to eat and many places listed on the National Registry of Historical places.

Greer is also the site of the largest BMW manufacturing facility in North America. BMW's Greer plant employs about 11,000 people, producing 450,000 cars annually; this attracted dozens of suppliers into South Carolina, providing jobs for more than 12,000 people. Greer is home to the South Carolina Inland Port, an intermodal facility that receives and sends containers by rail to the Port of Charleston. Courtesy Wikimedia and Google.

Greer is full of history. Long before there was a Greer, South Carolina, the Cherokee Indians hunted and early settlers began to farm along the abundant rivers and creeks of the area. When the Indian Boundary Line was drawn in 1761 from the blockhouse in Tryon, North Carolina, south toward Greer, the Spartanburg County side of the line was deeded to the South Carolina Province. The closest blockhouse to Greer was Thompson's Fort, which offered safety and trading. In 1777 the Cherokees made treaties to cede the rest of the land to South Carolina. Today, Line Street commemorates this early history and serves as a county line.

The site of Greer was called the old Blakely Place, a 200-acre farm owned by James Manning Greer. The Blakely farmhouse was the first known house in the history of Greer and sat behind the Greer Drug Company in the vicinity of Victoria Street. According to tradition, Greer traded a few acres to the railroad in exchange for a wagon and a team of mules. He then sold the rest of his land to W.T. Shumate, who began selling lots when he realized the potential for a town around the train station. A lot in the planned business district sold for anywhere between $25 and $75 per acre.

Since the first post office was in the station, the postmark read "Greer's Depot." On March 25, 1876, with 15 votes the town was incorporated as "Greers." The "s" disappeared sometime in the early part of the century. Thus, Greer owed its creation to the Southern Railroad, which was finished in 1873. The first shipment was fertilizer from Greenville.
